1. Since February 1954, movie units attached to Chinese Communist forces (CCF) armies in North Korea have shown Chinese and Soviet talking pictures to the troops at battalion level, once or twice every two weeks. The majority of the movies were Soviet, with the Chinese language dubbed in.
2. An hour-long picture entitled "Tempest", produced by the Chinese army, described the activities of CCF soldiers engaged in defense work along the coast of the China mainland. A Soviet picture, "They Have Their Own Fatherland," which lasted about two hours, concerned Russian children captured by the Germans during World War II during their occupation of Soviet territory. At the end of the war, the children were taken to Great Britain, where they were being trained for future use as anti-Soviet intelligence agents. The Soviet government, however, learning of the situation, protested to the British government and succeeded in taking the children back to the USSR.
